Reducing Hispanic Teenage Pregnancy and Family Poverty

A Replication Guide
THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF LA RAZA (NCLR)

The National Council of La Raza (NCLR), the largest constituency-based national Hispanic organization, exists to improve life opportunities for the more than 22 million Americans of Hispanic descent. A nonprofit, tax-exempt organization incorporated in Arizona in 1968, NCLR serves as an advocate for Hispanic Americans and a national umbrella organization for 150 community-based organizations serving Hispanics in 36 states, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. NCLR seeks to create opportunities and address problems of discrimination and poverty through four major types of initiatives:

- Capacity-building assistance to support and strengthen Hispanic community-based organizations;

- Applied research, public policy analysis, and advocacy on behalf of the entire Hispanic community, designed to influence public policies and programs so that they equitably address Hispanic needs;

- Public information efforts to provide accurate information and positive images of Hispanics in the mainstream and Hispanic media; and

- Special catalytic efforts which use the NCLR structure and reputation to create other entities or projects important to the Hispanic community, including international projects consistent with NCLR’s mission.

NCLR is headquartered in Washington, D.C. and has program offices in Los Angeles, California; Chicago, Illinois; Phoenix, Arizona; and McAllen, Texas.

THE POVERTY PROJECT

The Poverty Project serves as NCLR’s base for information and advocacy regarding Hispanic poverty in the United States. The Poverty Project develops research and policy analysis reports, monitors poverty policy and legislation, provides policy analysis training to local affiliates, and disseminates information about Latino poverty and related issues to Congress, the media, national and local organizations, and the general public.

This guide reflects a cooperative effort between the National Council of La Raza (NCLR) and the Children's Defense Fund (CDF). Preparation of the guide would not have been possible without the contributions of the CDF Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Network. Specifically, Sharon Adams-Taylor of the American Association of School Administrators, Kathy Herre of the National Association of Junior Leagues, and Lowell Overby of the Young Men’s Christian Association provided expertise and assistance.

The guide's principal author was Sonia M. Pérez, Senior Policy Analyst for the NCLR Poverty Project. Luis A. Duany, former Program Associate, Education, Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention and Youth Development Division of the Children's Defense Fund, co-authored several chapters and provided extensive editing, data analysis, and advice.

Input and advice from NCLR staff were also instrumental to the development of the guide. David Yñiguez, former Vice President, Technical Assistance and Constituency Support (TACs), Grizelle Apodaca, Affiliate Services Director, and Charles Kamasaki, Vice President, Office of Research, Advocacy, and Legislation (ORAL), assisted in and supported the early planning stages of the project which resulted in this guide. Bernardo Ramírez of the NCLR Chicago field office assisted by conducting and reporting on two of the three site visits. Rich Bell, NCLR TACs Consultant, drafted program descriptions and edited an early version of this document. Administrative Assistant Marcus N. Johnson provided technical and logistical support, and compiled information for Chapter 4: Organizational and Printed Resources. Poverty Policy Analyst Deirdre Martínez also assisted with preparing information for this chapter and the charts, as well as with proofreading. Rosemary Aguilar designed the cover of the guide and provided technical support during the production process. Diane Cabrales, Materials Specialist, assisted with editing the guide. The authors would especially like to thank Emily Gantz McKay, NCLR Vice President for Institutional Development, for her substantive comments and edits which improved the guide's usefulness and comprehensiveness, and for her overall support in the preparation of the guide.

Several CDF staff were helpful in gathering data and information. Delia Pompe, Directory, and Ray O'Brien, Program Associate, Education, Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention and Youth Development Division, were especially helpful and provided technical assistance and support that was essential to the completion of the guide.

The many staff and participants with whom we spoke at each of the three sites — Centro de la Comunidad Unida/United Community Center, Inc. (UCC), Milwaukee, WI; Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. (CPLC), Phoenix, AZ; and the Guadalupe Center, Inc. (GGC), Kansas City, MO — deserve special recognition, and are too numerous to mention. We appreciate their willingness to spend time with the NCLR/CDF team and the valuable information they provided to share with other Hispanic community-based organizations interested in offering services to and advocating for Hispanic youth. The authors would especially like to thank Kim Wintersberger, Oscar Mireles, and José R. Galván, Jr. (UCC); Berta Salas, Emily Otero, and Hilda Simo (CPLC); and Cris Medina, Anne Otto, and Diane Rojas (GGC).

This guide was modeled after two NCLR publications, Getting Started, Becoming Part of the AIDS Solution and Becoming Involved In the Aging Network, A Planning and Resource Guide for Hispanic Community-based Organizations. Information for preparation of the guide was also obtained from the June 1991 NCLR publication, Evaluating HIV/STD Education and Prevention Programs: An Introduction and the 1988 CDF Adolescent Pregnancy Child Watch Manual Supplement. Reference materials obtained from SIECUS (the Sex Information and Education Council of the U.S.) were also useful and have been noted in Chapter 4: Organizational and Printed Resources. In addition, numerous CDF publications were used for background information; appropriate citations are given throughout the text. Two preliminary drafts of this guide were released at the NCLR annual conference in Houston, Texas in July 1991 and at the Hispanic Family Conference in Milwaukee, WI in November 1991.

The views and opinions expressed in this guide are those of the authors and NCLR and do not necessarily reflect the positions of any NCLR funders, or of any of the organizations profiled or listed in this guide as references.

This guide was designed to help Hispanic community-based organizations develop and establish a teenage pregnancy prevention or teenage parenting program for Latino adolescents. It does not assume prior knowledge of the scope of teenage pregnancy in the United States or in the Latino community, only an understanding that early, unplanned births result in poverty and limited opportunities for all adolescents. The guide also underscores the critical role that Latino community-based organizations can play in preventing teenage pregnancy and providing hopeful futures for Hispanic youth.

The guide provides the information required to enable you to understand the magnitude of teenage pregnancy in the Latino community, as well as the severity of its consequences. It will also guide you through the process of gathering information about teenage pregnancy, working in collaboration with other groups to address the issue, and helping your organization plan, develop, and implement a prevention or parenting program that effectively meets the needs of Latino youth in your community.

The guide is designed to be of use by Latino organizations and those that serve the diverse Latino communities in the U.S. In addition, the guide is designed to assist organizations that have little or no experience with teenage pregnancy programs. It offers step-by-step guidance in developing and implementing a teenage pregnancy prevention or parenting program. The guide is also a useful reference document for existing programs or those that wish to broaden their scope.

How the Guide is Organized

The guide is divided into four chapters and one appendix:

- Chapter 1: Introduction provides an overview of the topic of adolescent pregnancy, with an emphasis on the impact of teenage pregnancy on the Latino community; it also explains how the guide was developed and why it is necessary for community-based organizations to address teenage pregnancy. This chapter includes a selected list of references about teenage pregnancy.

- Chapter 2: Three Latino Community-Based Model Programs for Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention and Parenting provides thorough descriptions and details about the programs on which this guide was based. It also offers sample materials from each program for community-based organizations to review and adapt for their use.

- Chapter 3: Developing an Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention or Parenting Program for Latino Youth offers suggestions about what community-based organizations should consider as they decide between developing programs that focus either on teenage pregnancy prevention or teenage parenting. This chapter also provides a detailed, step-by-step guide for community-based organizations to walk through in the planning, development, and implementation of their programs.

- Chapter 4: Organizational and Printed Resources provides a comprehensive list of resources available for community-based organizations to understand and appropriately address the challenge of teenage pregnancy in the Hispanic community.

- Appendix: NCLR Worksheets provides eight worksheets designed for community-based organizations to gather information and assess the needs of Latino youth related to the process of planning and implementing teenage pregnancy prevention and parenting programs.
Using the Sample Materials from the Program Models

The materials and information provided in this manual were developed with significant input from three NCLR affiliates, community-based organizations that provide services to various Latino populations in three cities. Information about each organization is provided prior to each model program summary.

To encourage the adaptation and replication of these programs, sample materials (documents or forms) from each model program are included within each program summary. These forms are included to facilitate the development and implementation of similar programs at community-based organizations across the country, particularly those that serve Latino adolescents. The forms can be modified or used as they are and are presented so that organizations will not have to develop materials that already exist. Materials focused solely on prevention, including a sample letter to parents, can be found on page 21. Those that have been developed for teen parenting programs, including intake forms and employment development plans, can be found on pages 27 to 29.

About the Organizational and Printed Resources

The resources provided in Chapter 4 of this guide come from multiple sources and represent the range of materials that are available for understanding and responding to teenage pregnancy in the Hispanic community.

The first set of resources are national organizations that provide information, materials, data, and/or program referrals about teenage pregnancy. Some focus on prevention, some on parenting, others on both. Many of the organizations listed work on a wide variety of issues, not solely teenage pregnancy; additionally, some offer materials in Spanish or for Hispanic populations while others provide information about multiple population groups. Listings include addresses, phone numbers, fax numbers, and organizational descriptions.

The second set of resources are curricula resource materials to be used by community-based organizations—or schools—to specifically address teenage pregnancy and related issues, such as decision making, values, sexuality, and peer pressure. Materials in this section are organized by age or educational level. Additional resources are organized by the following categories: “Parents’ Resources,” “Leaders’ Resources,” and “Males’ Resources.”

The third set of resources is a selected bibliography of general publications on the topics of adolescent pregnancy and parenthood, and reports from the Children’s Defense Fund Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Clearinghouse Series.

Using the NCLR Worksheets

The guide provides worksheets and sample forms for community-based organizations to use as they begin the process of gathering information and planning, developing, and implementing a teenage pregnancy program. There are eight NCLR worksheets, each with its own explanation. The worksheets are intended to help community-based organizations assess the needs of Latino youth in their communities, decide on the appropriate role they should play, develop a plan of action, and document and assess their work.

The NCLR Worksheets are meant to be reproduced and adapted for individual agencies’ use and will help you to capture the information you need as your organization develops its program.
model. Some worksheets that are essential to program development provide a space in the right top corner of the form for your organization’s name, address, and/or logo. Whether you use the forms as they appear, or customize them to your organization’s needs, they are an essential tool in the planning of a teenage pregnancy prevention or teenage parenting program.

Using the Guide

By using this guide, as either a step-by-step manual or a reference book, you should be able to obtain and understand the information needed to develop and implement (or expand) a teenage pregnancy program for Latino youth in your community.

The NCLR Poverty Project welcomes comments, suggestions, and additional sample program materials suitable for use by Hispanic-focused teenage pregnancy and youth programs. The Hispanic Population in the United States

Hispanics constitute the second largest minority group in the United States, with a mainland population of 22.35 million as of the 1990 Census; currently, about one in 11 Americans is Hispanic (9.0%). This reflects a 53% growth in the Hispanic population between 1980 and 1990. Hispanics constitute approximately 36% of the U.S. minority population and, by U.S. Census Bureau projections, are expected to become the largest ethnic minority in the U.S. around the turn of the century. In addition to being among the fastest-growing population groups, Hispanics are among the most diverse and also the youngest. Their demographic status reflects strong family values, a strong work ethic, and serious socioeconomic problems.

The Latino population includes many different nationality groups. As Chart 1 indicates, the majority — 62.6% — of Hispanics self-identify as Mexican Americans; 11.1% are Puerto Rican, 4.9% Cuban, 13.8% Central and South American, and 7.6% other Hispanics. Hispanics live in every part of the United States, but are heavily concentrated in a few states. The 1990 Census reported that more than half of all Hispanics live in California (34%) and Texas (19%); about 85% live in these two states plus New York (10%), Florida (7%), Illinois (4%), New Jersey (3%), Arizona (3%), New Mexico (3%), and Colorado (2%). Additionally, in these states, Hispanics constitute a growing proportion of the state population; for example, in California and Texas, Hispanics are one-quarter of each of these states’ total population.

The great majority of Hispanics live in urban areas — as of March 1991, 91.8% of Hispanics, compared to 72.8% of non-Hispanics, were urban residents — and are disproportionately affected by the social and economic problems found in many cities. For example, one of the most serious issues facing the Latino community in both urban areas and across the country is that Hispanics remain the most undereducated major segment of the U.S. population. While educational attainment levels have improved somewhat, Hispanics continue to enter school later, leave school earlier, and receive proportionately fewer high school diplomas and college degrees than other Americans. This is particularly troubling and has long-term social and economic consequences for the country since the Hispanic population is increasing at a fast rate and because, as a group, Hispanics are younger than other Americans. As of 1991, Latinos had a median age of 26.2, compared to 33.8 for non-Hispanics.

The undereducation of the Hispanic community has several consequences. First, although Hispanics are active in the workforce (Hispanic men have the highest labor force participation rate among male population groups; 78.2% of Hispanic men 16 and older were either working or seeking work in 1991, compared to 73.9% of non-Hispanic men), they are concentrated in low-wage jobs. Second, Latinos tend to have disproportionately high poverty rates. One in every four Hispanic families — and more than one in three Hispanic children — is poor. Recent Census Bureau data indicate that poverty, unemployment, and child poverty rates among Hispanic families are on the rise. Another consequence of undereducation and low-wage work is that, as a group, Hispanics are far more likely to lack health insurance than other Americans. Data from the 1990 Current Population Survey (CPS) indicate that 32% of Hispanics — compared to 13% of Whites and 20% of Blacks — are uninsured. These differences hold regardless of whether there is an adult worker in the family.

In addition to facing economic and social challenges, existing data indicate that, compared to other Americans, Hispanics are more likely to contract certain diseases, receive less preventive care, and have less access to health education or care. This has particularly serious consequences for Hispanic women and children. While data show that the fertility rate for Hispanics is higher than for other major U.S. populations, Hispanic women are far more likely than White women to receive late prenatal care or none at all. In 1989, 56.7% of Mexican American mothers, 60.8% of Central and South American mothers, and 62.7% of Puerto Rican mothers received prenatal care in the first trimester of pregnancy, compared to 82.7% of White mothers and 59.9% of Black mothers.

Finally, Hispanics are more likely than Whites but less likely than Blacks to live in female-headed households. In 1990, almost one-quarter (23.1%) of Hispanic families were maintained by a female householder, with no husband present, compared to about one-eighth of White families (12.9%) and more than two-fifths of Black families (43.8%). The percentage of woman-maintained families ranges from a low of 19.1% among Mexican Americans and 19.4% among Cubans to 26.1% for Central and South Americans and 43.3% for Puerto Ricans.

Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenting in the Hispanic Community

The issue of adolescent pregnancy has gone from being a significant societal challenge to a social and economic crisis. According to the National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS) and the Children’s Defense Fund (CDF), the teenage pregnancy rate rose steadily during the late 1960s and peaked in 1970 with 656,000 births to adolescents. By 1988, the number of births to teenagers declined to about 490,000. Since then, however, there has been an upward trend in the rate; today, a higher proportion of teenagers are having babies than at any time since the early 1970s.

Current data show that every year in the United States, more than one million teenagers — most of whom are not married and have not completed their high school education — get pregnant every year, and about half of these have a baby. CDF reports that one in every eight births in this country is to a teenager. In addition, according to the Alan Guttmacher Institute, of the teenage pregnancies conceived in 1987, half resulted in a birth, slightly more than one-third in abortion, and the remainder is estimated to have resulted in miscarriage. Moreover, nearly one-quarter of those births to teenagers were not first births.

While the impact of unplanned pregnancies is great for all girls, teenage pregnancy and its consequences are especially problematic in the Black and Latino communities. “Although there are more white than minority teen pregnancies, minority teens have higher pregnancy rates. In 1988 one in 10 white births was to a teenager, compared with one in six Latino births, and more than one in five black births.”

Ethnic and racial data on adolescent pregnancy and births has been collected differently by state and not all states report Hispanic origin of parents. Up until 1988, Hispanic origin was reported by 30 states; as of 1989, 47 states except Louisiana, New Hampshire, and Oklahoma (none of which has a significant Hispanic population) reported births to Hispanic mothers. These data show that teenage pregnancy and parenting have become significant issues in the Hispanic community.

Every day about 240 Hispanic children are born to teen mothers in 47 states that report births to Hispanic women; although only 9% of all adolescent females are Hispanic, about 17% of all teen births are to young Hispanic women.\textsuperscript{11} In a recent two-year period (1985-1987), there was an increase of 5000 births among Hispanic women under 20.\textsuperscript{12} These figures translate into thousands of babies being born to undereducated and socially and economically unprepared Latino teenagers every year. In 1988, 73,858 babies in 30 reporting states were born to Hispanic women under 20 years old; the following year, there were 88,880 births to young Latinas in 47 reporting states — a relative increase of 14%.\textsuperscript{13} In some states, Hispanics are greatly overrepresented among adolescent parents; in California and New Mexico, for example, about half of all teen births in 1989 were to Hispanic adolescents.

One of the main reasons why current teenage pregnancy data are becoming more alarming, especially in the Black and Latino communities, is that young parents are not marrying. This has contributed to the increase in single-parent families among all racial/ethnic groups, although the overwhelming majority of these families are single-mother families. The likelihood that these girls and their children will spend some or all of their lives in poverty is great. Often without the financial and emotional support of the fathers, and with limited education and employment skills of their own, these young families are vulnerable to the effects of persistent poverty. As illustrated in \textbf{CHART 2}, in 1989, almost two-thirds of Black and Latino children (63.1\% and 64.3\%, respectively) in female-headed families were poor.\textsuperscript{14} By contrast, 18.3\% of Black and 25.2\% of Latino children in married-couple families were poor in 1989. Poverty rates are further exacerbated if the family is headed by a person younger than 25 years of age and/or if the head of household does not have a high school diploma; \textbf{CHART 3}, on the next page, presents poverty data by family type.

Factors Associated with Adolescent Pregnancy

Several factors are associated with high rates of teenage pregnancy, including educational attainment, socioeconomic status, and future outlook.

Education is one of the most salient factors affecting teenage pregnancy rates. Data from the National Longitudinal Survey (NLS) show that poor youth with low basic academic skills, regardless of racial/ethnic group, are at least four times as likely as non-poor teenagers with above-average academic skills to become pregnant by age 19. Educational indicators show that Hispanic youth are among the least educated groups in the United States, with Mexican Americans having the lowest educational attainment rates of any of the five Latino subgroups. Latino youth are more likely than their White and Black peers to enter school later and leave school earlier. Additionally, regardless of the measure used, Hispanic youth are less likely to complete high school and enter and complete college than White and Black youth. The most recent U.S. Census data show that slightly more than half of all Hispanics aged 25 years or older have completed high school (51.3%) compared to four-fifths of non-Hispanics (80.5%) and less than one in ten Hispanics have completed four years of college or more (9.7%) compared to more than one in five non-Hispanics (22.3%).

A second factor which makes Latino youth susceptible to early, unplanned pregnancy and childbearing is their low socioeconomic status. Recent U.S. Census data illustrate that Hispanic children are more likely than other children to live in families that are poor, headed by a parent who has not completed high school, and/or headed by a single mother. In 1990, one in four Hispanic families (25.0%) lived below the federal poverty level, compared to less than one in 10 non-Hispanic families (9.7%). As CHART 4 illustrates on the next page, Hispanic children, as a whole, are more likely than White but less likely than Black children to be poor. Puerto Rican children are the poorest of all children; more than half were poor in 1990. Additionally, in 1987 four in 10 Latino adolescents had a parent with a high school diploma, compared to eight in 10
Whites and seven in 10 Blacks. Of all Hispanic families, almost one-quarter were maintained by a woman in 1990 (23.8%), a figure that is higher for some Latino subgroups and which is rising among all racial/ethnic groups. That same year, almost half of Hispanic single-mother families were poor (48.3%) compared to 48.1% of Black and 26.8% of White single-mother families. Hispanic children in single-parent families are more than twice as likely to be poor as Hispanic children in two-parent families (64.3% vs. 25.5%). Because of the disadvantage that often comes with such poverty, including lack of educational and social opportunities, Hispanic youth are vulnerable to engaging in risky behaviors like unprotected sex and substance use and abuse.

Finally, as a result of both limited educational opportunities and low socioeconomic status, Latino youth, like many similarly disadvantaged adolescents, have high aspirations but low expectations for their future. Community-based organizations which serve youth often note the lack of self-esteem and security that Hispanic and other disadvantaged youth feel. Qualitative studies have indicated that many of these teenagers find an unplanned pregnancy both common and acceptable. Many youth view childbirth and parenting as a sign of adulthood and an opportunity to “feel loved.”

Consequences of Unintended Adolescent Pregnancy

Teen parenthood has ramifications for the futures of the young woman, her partner, their baby, the Hispanic community, and, indeed, all of society. Research and data point to four major areas in which unintended pregnancy and childbearing have long-term consequences:

- Education. According to the 1982 Follow-Up to the High School and Beyond Study, Hispanic female adolescents cite pregnancy and/or early marriage as significant factors in their decision to drop out of school. Compared to Black and White pregnant youth, data show that Hispanic pregnant teens are more likely to drop out of high school and less likely to re-enroll to obtain their diplomas. About one-quarter of young Hispanic mothers who had children during their teen years had completed high school by their mid-twenties, compared with more than half of White teens and two-thirds of Black teens interviewed in 1982. While more programs for pregnant teenagers have become available since then, racial/ethnic differences in their high school completion rates persist.
• Health. Teenagers often lack information regarding their health and the importance of good health and nutrition habits during pregnancy. This is a function of both lack of access to good prenatal and overall health care, and lack of health insurance — a severe problem for the Hispanic community, since one in three Hispanics does not have health insurance. As a result, pregnant adolescents and their babies are vulnerable to a variety of illnesses and complications, including low birthweight babies and babies born with birth defects, both of which have serious implications for a child’s level of school readiness. In addition to unintended pregnancy, another serious effect of unprotected intercourse is the risk of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), including AIDS. According to the Center for Population Options, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group with expertise in sexuality and family-planning issues, adolescents experience higher rates of STDs than any other age group yet, they are the least likely to seek treatment.

DATA NOTE: Adolescent pregnancy data, especially teenage pregnancy and abortion rates, are not easy to obtain by ethnicity. In most cases, data are collected by White and Black, or by White and Non-White, thus Hispanic data are difficult to disaggregate. The data below are the most current that could be obtained for Hispanics for each category.

Marriage

• In 1988, 12% of all 15- to 19-year old Hispanic women had ever been married, compared to 7% of White young women and 2% of Black young women.

Factors Associated with Teenage Pregnancy

• Female high school dropouts, whether married or not, are six times as likely to have children early as females who complete high school and Latino youths leave school at twice the national rate: the most current data show that four in ten 16- to 24-year-old Latinos are out of school without a diploma.

• Similar to Whites and Blacks, one in five 16- to 19-year-old Latinas with below-average basic academic skills and from a poor family was a parent in 1981. But only one in 20 Latinas with above-average skills and family income above the poverty level had become a parent.

The Steps that Lead to Teenage Pregnancy

• At every age, Hispanic adolescent females are less likely than White or Black teen females to have had sexual intercourse. Compared to 74% of Whites and 78% of Blacks, 70% of Hispanic females ages 18-19 had had sexual intercourse in 1988.

• Hispanic adolescent males are more likely than their White counterparts and less likely than their Black counterparts to have had sexual intercourse by age 19. In 1988, 81% of Hispanic young men, 76% of White young men, and 96% of Black young men had had intercourse.

• Among Hispanic teenagers engaging in sexual intercourse, Hispanic and Black young women are less likely to use contraception than their White counterparts. In 1988, almost half of Hispanic and Black adolescent females (46.1% and 45.9%, respectively) — compared to less than one-third of White female teens (31.0%)— reported not using any contraceptive method at first intercourse.

• According to the Alan Guttmacher Institute, 66% of Black, 54% of White, and 53% of Hispanic males aged 15-19 reported using a condom the last time they had intercourse.

• In 1985, 16% of Latina young women, compared to 10% of White and 19% of Black young women, aged 15-19 were pregnant.

• Once pregnant, Hispanic young women under 20 tend to have births — rather than abortions — at higher rates than White or Black pregnant teenagers. Compared to 41% of White and 38% of Black teen pregnancies, 31% of the pregnancies to Hispanic female adolescents ended in abortion in 1985.
• Family Stability. Teen births are much more likely than non-teen births to be out-of-wedlock; CDF data show that, in 1988, 54% of births to White adolescents were out-of-wedlock, compared to 59% among Latinas, and 91% among Blacks. Moreover, data from the 1984 National Longitudinal Survey indicate that one-fourth of young mothers who had married were divorced or separated by the time their oldest children were four or five.

• Socioeconomic Status. One of the most long-lasting results of early family formation for Latino youth is the likelihood of poverty — a status which is further complicated by low educational attainment and early marriages mentioned above. Teenage marriages that are prompted by a pregnancy or birth tend to be fragile and young families are especially vulnerable to poverty. In March 1990, two-thirds of Hispanic female heads of household between the ages of 18 and 24 who had less than four years of high school were living below the federal poverty level (65.0%). Teen mothers and their children are disproportionately

HISPANIC COMMUNITY: A SNAPSHOT

Births to Latina Teenagers

- Latina and Black teens aged 15-19 are twice as likely to become parents as White teens. In 1988, about one Latina teen in 10 gave birth, compared with slightly more than one in 10 Black teens, and fewer than one in 20 White adolescent females aged 15-19.

- In 1989, Latina women under the age of 20 gave birth to 88,880 babies in 47 reporting states. Teenage mothers accounted for about one in six Latino births that year (17%), compared to about one in 10 White and more than one in five Black births. Yet there was wide variation among Latino subgroups: while 22% of Puerto Rican births and 17% of Mexican births were to teenagers, only 7% of Cuban births and 8% of Central and South American births were to women under age 20 in 1989.

- Latino teen births are concentrated in several states, like the Latino population in general. In 1988, California and Texas alone accounted for two-thirds of the reported births to Latina teens. These two states and six others (New York, Arizona, Illinois, Florida, New Mexico, and New Jersey) accounted for 92% of births reported to Latina teens that year.

- Compared to 54% of White teen births, 59% of Latino teen births were to unmarried women in 1988 — a 37% increase over the last decade. The proportion of teen births born to unmarried women also varies widely by Latino subgroup: 76% for Puerto Ricans, 62% for Central and South Americans, 53% for Mexicans, and 44% for Cuban Americans.

- The out-of-wedlock proportion of births to teens also varies widely by state; in 1988, two of five Latino teen births were born to unmarried women in Texas, Nevada, Georgia, and North Carolina — compared to four in five of their counterparts in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Hawaii.

Impact of Teenage Pregnancy

- Only 27 percent of Latina mothers who had children during their teen years had completed high school by their mid-twenties, compared with 55 percent of whites and 67 percent of black teen mothers (1982).

- About one in six Latina teens did not get adequate prenatal care during their pregnancies, compared to about one in 10 White and one in seven Black teens giving birth in 1988. Nineteen percent of Mexicans, 15% of Central and South Americans, 14% of Puerto Ricans, and 9% of Cuban teen births in 1983 were to women receiving late (starting after the six month of pregnancy) or no prenatal care at all.

- Latina teens’ use of prenatal care during pregnancy varies by state. About one in 10 Latino teen births in Massachusetts and Utah — compared to more than one in five in New Mexico, Georgia, Nevada, and Texas — were born to women receiving late or no prenatal care.

poor and are especially likely to depend on public assistance for economic security, although research shows that the availability of benefits from the federal public assistance program, Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC), does not influence the decisions of young, unmarried girls to have babies.

For Hispanic families, unmarried adolescent births exacerbate poverty, since having a household headed by a woman is the major predictor of poverty for Latino families. While one in four Hispanic families currently lives below the poverty level (25.0%), almost one in two Hispanic families that are maintained by a woman is poor (48.1%). Moreover, the gap between the poverty rates for Latino children living in single-parent vs. two-parent families is significant: while more than two-thirds of Latino children in female-headed households lived below the poverty level in 1989 (64.3%) by contrast, one-quarter of Latino children in two-parent families were poor that same year (25.5%). Yet, this figure still compares unfavorably to White children among whom 9.1% in two-parent families were poor in 1989. As CHARTS 5 and 6 indicate, poverty rates are especially severe for young families and those whose household head has low educational attainment.

Need for Action

With both the growing Hispanic population in this country and the increase in out-of-wedlock births among young, undereducated Hispanic women, it is incumbent upon all sectors of society to take an active role in encouraging youth to postpone pregnancy until they are educationally, financially, and emotionally prepared to become parents. Hispanic youth represent a significant portion of our future workforce and the next generation of taxpayers who will contribute to our country’s social and economic development. It is imperative that they be given positive, hopeful messages at all levels of society — community, state, federal — about postponing parenthood and enhancing their education and employment skills.

Appropriately, the prevention of unplanned pregnancy and too-early childbearing among Hispanic youth is a priority for many Hispanic youth-serving community-based organizations. This guide is designed to facilitate the crucial role that such organizations can play in preventing early family formation and poverty among another generation of Hispanic youth. Adolescent pregnancy prevention is also a focus for national policy organizations, like the National Council of La Raza and the Children’s Defense Fund, committed to reducing poverty among Hispanic and other minority families and to helping young people make successful transitions to adulthood.

The National Council of La Raza and the Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Network

The National Council of La Raza (NCLR) serves as an advocate for Latinos and as a national umbrella organization for 150 “affiliates,” community-based organizations which serve Hispanics in 36 states, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. NCLR has four missions: applied research, policy analysis, and advocacy on behalf of the entire Hispanic community; public information efforts designed to provide accurate information and positive images of Hispanics; special innovative, catalytic, and international projects; and capacity-building assistance to support and strengthen the services that NCLR affiliates and other Hispanic community-based organizations provide to address poverty and discrimination in the Hispanic community. NCLR affiliates offer direct social services, education and employment training services, and/or conduct research and advocacy. Most technical assistance that NCLR offers its affiliates focuses on resource development, program operations, and management or governance needs. In addition, special projects have been developed to concentrate on specific affiliate needs.

In the fall of 1989, the Children’s Defense Fund (CDF), a Washington, D.C.-based organization that focuses on the educational, health, and other needs of poor, minority, and disabled children and youth, convened the Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Network. The Network, listed on the next page, of which NCLR is a member, consists of 31 national education, community, and youth-serving organizations concerned with the high rate of teen pregnancy in this country, and with the implications of such early childbearing, especially for poor and minority youth.

The primary goals of the Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Network are:

- To further the programmatic and policy work that current members are doing in teen pregnancy prevention through technical assistance and information sharing;
- To foster the development of collaborative teen pregnancy programs and activities, especially between Network members; and
- To raise national public awareness of the current teen pregnancy problem and its implications, while building consensus around potential solutions, both in terms of programs and policy.

As a member, NCLR viewed the Network and its resources as a way of supporting the work that NCLR affiliates are doing in the areas of youth development and adolescent pregnancy and parenting. In addition, NCLR’s participation in the Network serves as a bridge between the opportunities offered by the Network — in terms of technical assistance and adolescent pregnancy prevention materials — and NCLR affiliates.

The NCLR/CDF Teen Pregnancy Prevention Replication Project

In November 1990, NCLR staff met with CDF Network coordinators to discuss the initiation of a project focused on teen pregnancy prevention in the Hispanic community. The joint project that emerged was designed to maximize the benefits of the Network for NCLR affiliates and other Hispanic community-based organizations interested in expanding their focus on teenage pregnancy prevention.

The “Teen Pregnancy Prevention Replication Project” formally began in February 1991 with the identification of NCLR affiliates who were operating teen pregnancy prevention/parenting programs. Based on length of time in operation, overall organizational strength and stability, and organizational capacity to support the documentation process, three NCLR affiliates were selected to participate in the project: Centro de la Comunidad Unida/United Community Center, Inc. (Milwaukee, WI), Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. (Phoenix, AZ), and the Guadalupe Center, Inc. (Kansas City, MO).

Over the next six months, NCLR and CDF staff met to plan the details of the project, which was designed to document the development of community-based teen pregnancy programs specifically aimed at Hispanic youth. The goal of the project is to replicate similar programs in other Latino communities across the country.

There were three major phases to the planning process:

- The development of a survey to capture organizational details and characteristics;
- The decision to conduct site visits and program staff interviews to obtain “first-hand” information; and
- The formation of a team of adolescent pregnancy prevention and program evaluation “experts” which included two NCLR staff people, one CDF staff person, and three Network members.
Between May and June 1991, this team conducted site visits at Centro de la Comunidad Unida, Inc./United Community Center (UCC), Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. (CPLC), and the Guadalupe Center, Inc. (GCI) to document these affiliates’ teen pregnancy programs.

This replication guide is the result of the site visits and the wealth of information each affiliate provided. It also represents the knowledge and expertise each team member brought to the documentation process. The guide is intended to offer a structured, step-by-step approach to the development of a teen pregnancy and/or parenting community-based program for Hispanic youth. It also provides a description of the major factors and necessary components that should be considered and offers a comprehensive plan for becoming involved in the prevention of early pregnancy and childbearing among Hispanic teens, or for expanding current efforts in pregnancy prevention and teen parenting. The guide can be adapted to meet the needs of different communities. It is another tool which, combined with strong community-based efforts, can help to reduce the high rate of poverty among Hispanic families and help ensure a brighter future for Hispanic youth.
ENDNOTES

1 The terms Hispanic and Latino are used interchangeably throughout this guide to refer collectively to Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans, Cubans, Central Americans, South Americans, and “other Hispanics,” those from the Dominican Republic, Spain or of Spanish-speaking origin. When statistics are cited, there is no difference between the use of the term Latino and the Census’ use of the term Hispanic.

10 Hispanics are an ethnic group, not a race, therefore, Census and other official data sources will usually include the following clarification: “Persons of Hispanic origin can be of any race.”

13 Because Hispanics are concentrated in a few states, comparisons can be made between the 30 reporting states and the 47 reporting states. The programs on which this replication guide is based were selected for their overall strength and for their experience in helping to meet the needs of the Latino youth in their communities. The three programs also were chosen because they represent the programmatic range that exists in teen pregnancy programs. Adolescent pregnancy programs encompass two sets of efforts: those aimed at primary pregnancy prevention (i.e., prevention of a first pregnancy) and those focused on teenage parenting and prevention of unplanned, repeat births. A program’s components and philosophy can differ widely depending upon the focus that an organization decides to take.

Of the three programs documented below, one — Centro de la Comunidad Unida/United Community Center, Inc. (UCC) Decisiones Para Jóvenes/Decisions for Youth — is focused solely on primary pregnancy prevention. Community-based organizations that focus on primary pregnancy prevention, such as UCC, usually have a strong, overall youth development approach and serve teenagers in a variety of ways. For example, many of these organizations offer programs that encourage young people to complete their educations, set goals to prepare for their future employment, and develop a strong self-concept, often using recreation, tutoring, and other activities as a means by which to attract adolescents and encourage their participation. They also tend to be open year-round and during the evenings or to have flexible schedules to be available to teenagers as much as possible.

Adolescent parenting programs seek to make teen parents economically self-sufficient and tend to focus first on completion of high school, either by facilitating the student’s placement in his/her high school or by assisting the teen parent in obtaining his/her General Equivalency Diploma (GED). In addition to high school completion, many of these programs also stress the delay of a second or repeat pregnancy. Often, these programs are targeted primarily, though not exclusively, on the teen mother. Two of the programs highlighted here represent such programs. Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. (CPLC) Via de Amistad in Phoenix, AZ and the Guadalupe Center, Inc. (GCI) Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program in Kansas City, MO focus their efforts on assisting young, undereducated women who have had a baby to complete their education and enhance their employment skills. Via de Amistad assists adolescent women (up to age 21) by combining on-site child care and education and employment training classes with parenting classes. The Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program has chosen to target health care and a healthy outcome for pregnant adolescents. The program recruits pregnant teenagers in order to ensure that these young women will receive adequate prenatal care and postnatal follow-up services for both themselves and their children. Like the Via de Amistad program, the Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program also seeks to develop and strengthen parenting skills in the young women (and their partners) who participate in the program.

Finally, each of the programs highlighted here has a unique quality that helped to make them successful in their communities. UCC has developed a special collaborative relationship with the Milwaukee school system. Its programs are youth-focused and are based on a prevention philosophy. UCC links its youth programs for Hispanic teenagers; for example, sexuality education is combined with substance abuse education. Program staff also reach out to males. At GCI, program strength is derived from the center’s long history in the community. The programs are also a result of collaborative efforts with local hospital and clinic staff and program participants benefit from individual case managers who have small caseloads and offer intensive help. Similarly, staff at CPLC are very involved with program participants. The program offers young women a one-stop approach to meeting their needs; there is emphasis on education, employment training, and child care and job placement at the program’s end is a priority. Follow-up services are an important part of each program.
curriculum. Material developed by the program staff has been proven to significantly increase students' knowledge on issues of sexuality and substance abuse. The program is funded by the United Way of Greater Milwaukee, the March of Dimes Foundation, the Milwaukee County Department of Social Services, the State of Wisconsin Department of Health and Human Services, the Milwaukee Foundation, the State of Wisconsin Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Board, the Common Council Task Force on Sexual Assault and Domestic Violence, the Urban Middle School Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention project of the Academy for Educational Development, and the CHOICES Initiative, State of Wisconsin, Department of Health and Human Services.

Program Goals and Objectives

Decisions for Youth was originally designed to address two risk factors associated with teen pregnancy: dropping out of school and unemployment/underemployment. However, since many of the characteristics associated with early substance abuse are similar to those associated with early sexual activity, the program has expanded to provide Hispanic youths with decision-making skills in order to prevent alcohol and drug abuse as well.

The primary goal of Decisions for Youth is to reduce the incidence of first pregnancies among Hispanic adolescents by improving the health, well-being, sexual awareness, and sense of responsibility of participants. The program educates youth about alcohol and other drugs and, by assisting participants to develop strong decision-making skills, also promotes abstinence from sexual activity and from alcohol and other drug use.

Specific objectives include:

- To improve the knowledge of human sexuality, alcohol, and drugs of at least 75% of 600 youth in elementary, middle, and high school through structured educational sessions (6-15 sessions per classroom);
- To promote an understanding of sexuality, responsible sexual behavior, and decision-making skills;
- To provide support group sessions for 35 of these 600 youth, emphasizing sexual responsibility;
- To assist 100 participants in career exploration seminars to establish educational goals for the future and gain a better understanding of career/life options; and
- To train 30 adolescents to become Peer Educators to promote an understanding of human sexuality, alcohol, drugs, and responsibility to young children and their peers.

Program Components

Decisions for Youth delivers its services to Hispanic youth and their parents through direct education, training, and counseling in individual sessions, group discussions, and workshops. Educational sessions are conducted at UCC and within Milwaukee public schools, as well as in private schools such as Bruce-Guadalupe Community School. A sample letter that is sent to parents to notify them that their children will participate in the Decisions for Youth program/curriculum at school is shown on the next page (FIGURES 1 and 2).
Dear Parents:

In the coming weeks, your children will be participating in the "Decisions for Youth/Decisiones Jóvenes" program. This program has been developed to provide students with basic information about sexuality and alcohol and drugs.

Why is it important to communicate with your children about sexuality and alcohol and drug issues?

Children today are constantly bombarded with information about sex, sexuality and alcohol and drugs. There are many different sources of information: their friends, television, advertising, popular music and MTV or music videos.

Much of this information is not useful and often incorrect. Although schools may have good sexuality and alcohol and drug education programs, these programs cannot take the place of the guidance that you, as parents, can give your children.

Together we can educate our children so they will be informed and able to make healthy decisions. We hope this program will provide many opportunities to share your values and guidance with your children.

Enclosed is a list of the subjects your children will learn about in each grade level. If you have any questions or are interested in seeing our materials, please call me at 364-3100. Thank you for your cooperation and support.

Sincerely,

José R. Galven Jr.
Decisions for Youth Coordinator

Information in the Decisions for Youth program is presented through the following structured project components:

- Educational Sessions. Primarily targeted to Hispanic students in local public schools, in UCC's alternative school, and in other UCC programs, thirteen sessions are provided through classroom presentations, role plays, and videos about sexuality and alcohol and other drug abuse. Session topics cover self-esteem, male and female reproductive awareness, decision-making, sexual attitudes, customs, and values. On the next page, FIGURE 3 and 4 are examples of two curriculum components.

- Bilingual/Bicultural Counseling. Program staff provide one-on-one counseling, primarily to Hispanic adolescents and young adults, many of whom speak Spanish as a first language.

- Awareness Groups. Facilitated by volunteers, these groups meet at UCC and use presentations, discussions, videos, and role plays to present information on human sexuality and alcohol and other drug abuse. This is the program's principal component for parents. UCC staff recruit for these sessions at parent/teacher meetings and through the local media.

- Community Presentations. In addition to the other program areas, Decisions for Youth staff provide structured information through the use of booths at health fairs, and through presentations at other community-based organizations, schools, and local conferences. This includes the dissemination of informational brochures.

Decisions for Youth focuses solely on adolescent pregnancy prevention. If a teen does become pregnant, however, UCC staff and counselors are able to refer the adolescent and her partner to a variety of social service agencies and organizations (with whom they have well-developed relationships) that provide prenatal health care and that can help the teenager manage the range of issues that an unplanned pregnancy creates. UCC staff make a special effort to follow every young person that is referred so that they do not get lost "in the system."

Organizational and Programmatic Background

Via de Amistad (Pathway to Friendship), operated by Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. (CPLC), is a teen parenting program that also works to prevent secondary or repeat pregnancies among youth in South Phoenix, where the majority of the population is Hispanic. The program serves 150 to 200 pregnant and parenting youth each year between the ages of 13 and 21.

In response to the escalation of unplanned pregnancies among teenagers and young women in the South Phoenix community — and the health and socioeconomic risks associated with teenage pregnancy — CPLC established Via de Amistad in 1980. Originally begun as a counseling center for adolescent parents and expectant mothers through a pilot project funded by the Manpower Demonstration Research Corporation in New York, Via de Amistad has built on its early successes by expanding the program’s components to include a range of social, educational, and vocational services.

Throughout their participation, pregnant and parenting teenagers spend each day at the Via de Amistad facility from 9:00 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. involved in a number of activities to assist them in improving their self-esteem, becoming more responsive parents, and enhancing their educational and employment skills. The program offers: on-site vocational skills, basic education, and GED preparation; transportation subsidies; and workshops on parenting, sexuality, family planning, communication, nutrition, child development, career awareness, and career development. Program participants also receive the services of an assigned case manager who provides encouragement and support, in addition to acting as an advocate and offering social service counseling and referrals.

Via de Amistad participants have access to child care services while attending their assigned educational classes and workshops. The program provides a babysitting service which is staffed by Hispanic women from the community who participate in the Foster Grandparents program. It also allows for hands-on parenting training, as participants are required to spend part of their days with their children in the day care areas and have the benefit of receiving support and guidance from the foster grandmothers who volunteer their time.

In order to participate, program clients must be economically disadvantaged, 21 years of age or younger, and pregnant or parenting. Via de Amistad’s services are offered to both male and female youth, although the majority of participants are young women. Average length of participation is nine months before a participant is placed in employment or referred to another agency.
Program Goals and Objectives

Via de Amistad's aim is "to see young parents become self-supporting, independent people." The program also seeks to promote the well-being of the young family — both parents and children — and to encourage young parents to set and work toward personal and professional goals.

Specific program objectives include:

- To conduct outreach and serve youth in underserved areas of the community;
- To provide comprehensive services to participating youth, including employment and training, education, and parenting skills;
- To assist participating youth to obtain GEDs or at least increase their basic educational level by two grades;
- To assist youth in obtaining and maintaining unsubsidized employment;
- To educate and assist youth in order to prevent unplanned repeat pregnancies; and
- To expand the provision of basic education and health care services to participants and their children.

Program Components

Most young women who participate in Via de Amistad are referred by friends or relatives who have gone through the program, although outreach is also conducted through brochures and presentations to community residents. Upon entering the program, young women (and their partners) must complete the program's enrollment process. Participating youth are assisted with intake by Via de Amistad's Program Coordinator. A psychosocial history is taken and an individual Employment Development Plan (EDP) is prepared to outline a set of goals for each participant. Samples of these forms are presented in FIGURES 5 and 6, on the following pages, for other community-based organizations to adapt as needed. In addition, each participant is assigned a case manager — a social worker who provides social and emotional support and also helps to monitor his/her progress.

Program participants are then given basic skills tests to determine their math and verbal levels. At this point, they are placed into GED programs (to complete their secondary school education or to strengthen math and verbal skills) and/or employment training classes. Participants are also required to sign a participation agreement (see FIGURE 7 below) which outlines the services that the program offers and requests cooperation from program participants.

Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program

Organizational and Programmatic Background

Initiated in 1981, the Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program (WTP), operated by the Guadalupe Center, Inc. (GCI), is a comprehensive project which assists and educates pregnant Hispanic teenagers. The program was originally designed in response to the high number of teenage pregnancies in Kansas City. Specifically, the program seeks to address several factors: the need for education and social services, including family planning services; a lack of culturally-appropriate programs for Hispanics; and inadequate access to adolescent prenatal health care and other medical services, due to high costs and lack of transportation. The program was developed to respond to the barriers (e.g., language barriers and geographic isolation) that prevented pregnant Hispanic teenagers from receiving adequate care from the existing mainstream of social and medical services. The program's services were designed to consider ethnic differences in nutrition, education, parenting, and family dynamics.

WTP also works in close collaboration with other GCI programs that involve gang intervention, mentoring, and educational opportunities so that outreach can affect as many youth as possible. Since the focus is on the positive development of adolescents, much of the work involves educational activities. Because many adolescents who are at risk for early pregnancy and childbearing also tend to be vulnerable to other social problems, like gang-related activities and school failure, WTP broadens its target population to reach as many youth as possible. WTP's multi-service approach for pregnant Hispanic teenagers also addresses educational and vocational needs, including GED instruction, job placement, and English-as-a-Second Language classes.

WTP was originally funded through a grant from the federal Department of Health and Human Services and was structured to include a partnership between St. Mary's Hospital/Family Practice Center and GCI. The intent was that the Guadalupe Center, Inc. would be successful at reaching potential clients in the community and medical services would be provided by St. Mary's. Initially, the program was not effective because the majority of Hispanic clients were not Medicaid-eligible due to underemployment or legal status; the project originally targeted Medicaid recipients. In addition, the project had difficulties because the original counselors were neither Spanish-speaking nor Hispanic.
GCI revised the project in 1984 to address these areas of concern. It developed long-range goals and secured a grant which enabled it to form a multi-agency partnership. This new partnership involved the Guadalupe Center, Inc. the Richard Cabot Clinic — the only Hispanic-focused community-based health care provider in Kansas City — and St. Luke’s Hospital.

The WTP program targets low-income, pregnant, Hispanic and/or Westside neighborhood 13-to-19-year-old girls. The number of participants in the program varies anywhere from 20 to 40 young women. In general, 85% of the participants are Hispanic with an average age of 17 years. Nearly two-thirds of participants enter the program during the second trimester of pregnancy and more than one-third enter during the first three months of pregnancy. Half the participants live at home with one or both parents; fewer than one in five is married; and the remainder live either with a male partner, with relatives, or alone. Approximately 15% are high school graduates, 38% are still in school, and nearly half left school if not before then at the time of pregnancy or shortly thereafter. Between 20% and 30% of WTP participants are limited-English proficient. Young fathers and the parents of pregnant/parenting teens are often invited to participate in the program, but no formal program component addresses their needs or potential roles.

Program Goals and Objectives

The overarching goals of the program are to provide culturally-appropriate and comprehensive medical and social services to pregnant Hispanic teenagers and to provide ongoing prenatal and parenting education classes. The program seeks to assure the delivery of healthy babies, to reduce the likelihood of future unplanned pregnancies, and to foster economic self-sufficiency of adolescent parents.

Specific program objectives fall into two broad categories:

Health

- To ensure that at least 90% of pregnant WTP participants receive adequate prenatal care (nine visits or more beginning in the first trimester for a 36-week pregnancy);
- To ensure that no more than 9% of WTP participants will deliver low-birthweight babies (weighing less than 5 pounds, 8 ounces); and
- To ensure that no more than 10% of babies born will have complications requiring intensive care or resulting in neonatal mortality (death in the first 28 days of life).

Basic and Parental Education/Employment

- To ensure that at least 75% of WTP participants will have attended scheduled prenatal education classes and 75% will have attended scheduled parenting classes;
- To ensure that at least 50% of WTP teen mothers will be in school, high school graduates, or have received GEDs;
- To ensure that at least 35% will be enrolled in or have completed the Center’s school-to-work program;
- To ensure that at least 70% will be able to support their children or expect to have such capacity in the future.
Program Components

The Westside Teen Pregnancy Program has four distinct components: Prenatal Health Care, Prenatal and Parenting Education, Social Service, and Follow-Up. WTP components are designed to provide a comprehensive approach to service delivery for pregnant and parenting Hispanic adolescents. Upon entering the program, prospective clients are asked for detailed information to better address their needs. Some of the sample forms used to collect this information are presented in FIGURES 9 to 12.

The Prenatal Health Care component includes medical and laboratory services at the nearby Richard Cabot Clinic. It is coordinated by a college-educated, bilingual, bicultural, female, nurse practitioner with a pediatric specialty. The WTP counselor provides free transportation to the clinic and monitors appointments. The number of visits to the clinic is determined on a case-by-case basis. In addition, the GCI’s partnership with St. Luke’s Hospital assures each participant of a limit for the cost of their delivery.

The content of the program’s Prenatal and Parenting Education component is culturally-appropriate, informative, and helps participants make healthy decisions during pregnancy and during the first critical year of parenting. The classes are facilitated by a teenage pregnancy counselor, social worker, or nurse educator. Pamphlets, videos, and brochures from a variety of sources (e.g., March of Dimes) are used. FIGURE 13, on the next page, presents a brief overview of the six prenatal classes and the issues covered.

Six parenting classes provide information on family planning, attitudes toward parenting, life options (education and jobs available in the community), child development, child care and safety issues, discipline, and sexually-transmitted diseases. Instruction and curriculum materials are provided in Spanish and English. The parenting classes are informal and materials are developed and used according to the topics that each particular group is interested in discussing.

Either directly or through referrals, the Social Service component covers a wide range of needs. WTP is the only adolescent pregnancy program in Kansas City which offers job placement assistance, housing assistance, GED classes on site, transportation to and from necessary appointments, and a bilingual escort to assist clients in official meetings. WTP staff provide continuous case management, personal and family counseling, home visits, and assistance in obtaining federal entitlements such as WIC, AFDC, Food Stamps, and Medicaid. Other GCI staff provide emergency assistance (housing, food, utilities), job training and placement, child care, English-as-a-Second-Language and GED programs. Referrals are provided for adoption counseling, family planning services, and mental health services. A Follow-Up component helps participants adapt to their new roles and to overcome the economic, social, and educational barriers often associated with being a teenage parent.

Developing an Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention or Parenting Program for Latino Youth

Four Important Factors Before Getting Started

As an Executive Director, staff member, Board member, or concerned community resident associated with a community-based organization, you may be looking for a way to involve your community or agency in the issue of adolescent pregnancy. Or, you may be interested in developing a comprehensive pregnancy prevention program. You may want to enhance an already-existing teen parenting or other youth development program. This guide is designed to help you and your organization become effectively and appropriately involved in developing a teen pregnancy program for Hispanic youth, based on a careful planning process that considers the young person and his/her family and community.

There are four important factors to keep in mind as you think about how best to involve your organization in teen pregnancy program efforts:

First, you must decide whether your organization will focus on teenage pregnancy prevention or teen parenting, or both.

While the steps that follow can be applied in the development of either type of program, it is important to be clear about the distinctions between prevention and parenting and the considerations that must be taken into account in developing each type of program. Ask yourself the following questions:

- Based on your formal or informal assessment of community status, what is the greatest need? Maybe a teen parenting program already exists in your area but does not specifically target Hispanic youth. Could you focus on prevention instead and encourage the other program to look more carefully at Hispanic teen parents — using the statistics you have gathered during the assessment?
- For which program are you likely to get the most support?
- What are your organization’s strengths?
- Consider the desirable characteristics of each type of program. (See next section in this chapter for characteristics of effective programs.) Which type of program can you effectively run? For example, would it be feasible for your organization to provide child care if you begin to develop a teen parenting program?

Second, while the issue of teen pregnancy provokes a reaction from all communities — and is often associated with controversy or resistance in the Hispanic community — teen pregnancy programs for Hispanic youth should be considered part of broader agency efforts to promote the positive development of economically disadvantaged Hispanic teens.

Presented in this way, adolescent pregnancy prevention can be a direct consequence of community-based programs that focus on broadening life options for Hispanic youth. And adolescent parenting programs can be promoted as a way of enhancing parenting and employment skills to improve the life chances of the young Latino family.

Third, it is important to remember that community-based organizations that serve Hispanic youth have a significant role to play in teen pregnancy prevention and parenting efforts.

Adolescence is a difficult period for all young people; for those teenagers who — like many Hispanic youth — must also cope with poverty, conflicting cultural values, poor educational facilities, threatening environments, and limited social options, it can be a time of greater uncertainty and confusion. Many Hispanic adolescents lack motivation and self-confidence, do not fully understand the consequences of certain actions, and cannot see their future in a positive light. In communities where resources and opportunities are limited, community-based agencies frequently fill the gap that many of these teenagers experience by providing social and other support services. Teenage pregnancy prevention and parenting programs, as part of other youth development activities that enhance educational and social skills, as well as a young person’s capacity to be self-sufficient, are crucial to reducing the high rate of poverty experienced by young Hispanic families.

Fourth, in many communities with large Hispanic populations, there are few, if any, youth-serving agencies that reach out to Hispanic adolescents.

Hispanic youth need culturally-sensitive programs and counselors who understand that, for many of these teenagers, the process of balancing often-conflicting views between their parents’ world and their own can be overwhelming. Such programs are often the deciding factor in offsetting actions that can have a potentially long-term adverse impact on a Hispanic youth’s life and future.

The following section provides a step-by-step approach to developing a comprehensive teenage pregnancy program for Hispanic youth. It is an important tool that your organization can use as it works to serve Hispanic youth and their families in securing a more socioeconomically stable future.

Characteristics of Effective Teenage Pregnancy Prevention and Parenting Programs

As your organization begins to plan for the development of a teenage pregnancy program, you must make the distinction between whether you will focus on pregnancy prevention, parenting, or both. The type of program your organization chooses to develop and implement must meet the needs of the community — as determined by your community assessment — while drawing upon your organization’s strengths. In fact, one of the reasons why each of the programs described in chapter 2 is effective is because each has carefully thought through what it could offer and what it had the resources to provide.

Adolescent pregnancy involves many complex issues and one organization does not have to feel that it must tackle it all. Your goal should be to help fill an existing service gap so that the Latino youth in your area will have supports and services to help them successfully go through the transition from adolescence to adulthood.

Before your organization’s staff and Board go through the steps of thinking through and developing a teen pregnancy program, it should gather as much information as possible about the make-up of effective, community-based program models. Based on the programs documented in this guide and on teenage pregnancy program data, the following is a summary of key characteristics that organizations should keep in mind when developing a teenage pregnancy program for Latino youth. Programs will certainly vary by community composition and need, but all programs should be developed to ensure that youth are being served as best as possible. The characteristics presented below and the range of program components described using the models in this guide give a comprehensive view of elements to include in developing effective teenage pregnancy and parenting programs.
Adolescent pregnancy programs, both prevention and parenting, do not differ greatly from other youth development programs. In some cases, in fact, programs that serve youth by providing educational or recreational activities help delay sexual activity by encouraging strong self-esteem, sound decision-making, respect for others, and many skills that strengthen a young person’s sense of responsibility for him or herself. There are some concrete elements that can be built into general youth development programs to shift their focus to teen pregnancy prevention or to adolescent parenting. Moreover, specific qualities are important to incorporate into programs that serve Latino youth.

Below is a summary of the key characteristics of effective teenage pregnancy prevention and parenting programs. Considered in conjunction with the components that the three programs highlighted in this guide have developed, they are meant to present comprehensive models of effective teenage pregnancy prevention and parenting programs.

TWOVE STEPS TOWARD DEVELOPING AN ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY PREVENTION OR PARENTING PROGRAM FOR LATINO YOUTH

STEPS IN THE PLANNING PROCESS

1. Learn the basics about adolescent pregnancy, especially among Hispanic youth, and educate other staff, your agency, and/or your community.

2. Assess the needs of Hispanic youth in your community as well as available services and gaps that need to be filled.

3. Identify alternative roles for your organization to play and decide which one to adopt.

4. Build a community coalition and a plan of action that anticipate potential opposition and provide strategies for possible opposition to your program.

5. Develop a detailed internal plan of action for your agency.

6. Identify funding sources and community resources that will support adolescent pregnancy prevention and parenting efforts.

7. Secure key staff who have an interest in and commitment to working with Hispanic adolescents.

8. Establish cooperative agreements with other community agencies responsible for delivering services to youth.

9. Create an outreach plan to attract and retain Hispanic youth — including young Hispanic men.

10. Document your planning and implementation process thoroughly.

11. Become an advocate for Hispanic youth.

12. Develop an evaluation tool that will allow you to monitor and assess the program’s implementation and progress.

STEP 1

LEARN THE BASICS ABOUT ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY, ESPECIALLY AMONG HISPANIC YOUTH, AND EDUCATE OTHER STAFF, YOUR AGENCY, AND/OR YOUR COMMUNITY.

The first step to planning and implementing a teen pregnancy or teen parenting program for Hispanic adolescents is to educate yourself and your organization. This should include Board members and the Hispanic community. Your goal in this first step is to try to collect specific data on both teen pregnancy itself and the incidence of factors related to teen pregnancy. During this process, you will also become more familiar with the terminology and statistical references used by advocates; these will help to clarify the data you collect.

Research on the implications of teen pregnancy, childbearing, and parenthood such as abortion, adoption, marriage rates among those teens who become parents, access to and use of prenatal care, low birthweight and infant mortality, dropping out of school, and welfare dependency are useful and necessary statistical indicators to know as you begin the process of designing and implementing a teen pregnancy program. Knowledge of these data will be crucial for you to educate your staff and your community and will lay the foundation for the work to follow.

For Hispanic youth, additional factors may be involved in and complicate early pregnancy and childbearing, such as language and cultural barriers; rigid gender roles and strict parents, especially for young Hispanic females; lack of access to the health care system; low parental education and literacy; and other cultural or legal issues due, in some cases, to recent immigration. Try to gain an understanding of these issues through reading reports of studies and talking to experts in the field.

In order to help you gather some of these data, you will find a selected list of national organizations and useful publications in Chapter 4 of this guide that can assist you in gathering information on teen pregnancy prevention and teen parenting. Additionally, do not overlook other local community-based organizations that serve Latino youth, organizations like the United Way, and civil rights and minority social services agencies. The three organizations and programs highlighted in this guide are other good sources of program data.

To help you organize and better understand the teenage pregnancy issue in your community — and educate others — you will need to gather four sets of information. Below is a summary of the four types of data to obtain as well as key questions to ask as you collect this information. (The sample worksheets provided in the Appendix will help you in gathering some of this information.)

Demographic Data. Start with a solid foundation of basic demographic data to paint a clear picture of your community, city, state, or region and the people that you will be serving.

TRY TO FIND:

- What is the total population of your city, state?
- Is your population urban, rural, or mixed?
- What are the racial and ethnic group population breakdowns? (Hispanic subgroup breakdowns are not always easy to find but are very useful.)
- What is the median age (the number at which half of the group falls above and half below) of each of the population subgroups in your community, city, state?
- What is the median family size of each population subgroup in your community, city, state?
- What is the educational attainment (level of school completed) of each population subgroup?
- What proportion (percentage) of each population subgroup is working in the paid labor force?
• What are the major occupations of the employed population subgroups in your community, city, state?

• What are the median earnings of each population subgroup? Also, what are the median earnings by gender (if available)?

• What is the proportion of families that are two-parent? single-parent?

• What is the median income of family households for each population group? What about by family composition (e.g., single mother, two parent)?

• What is the poverty rate of each of the population subgroups?

• What is the child poverty rate of each of the population subgroups?

Data on the Factors Associated with Teen Parenting. Get a clearer sense of the major factors that are associated with a young person’s chances of becoming a teen parent. These data should be available from your demographic profile. Some of these data may not be available specifically for Hispanics in your community, but they might be available for Hispanics in the city or the state.

• Sexual Activity. Obviously, only those adolescents involved in sexual relationships might get pregnant.

TRY TO FIND:

• What proportion of teenagers are having sexual intercourse? (This information is especially useful by age and by race/ethnicity, if available.)

• Timing and Frequency of Contraceptive Use. National data show that most teenagers who are sexually active do not use birth control or protect themselves from sexually-transmitted diseases.

TRY TO FIND:

• What proportion of sexually active teenagers used contraceptives at first intercourse?

• How likely are Hispanic versus White or Black teenagers to use contraceptives?

• Poverty, Education, and Family Structure. National teenage pregnancy data show that, regardless of race or ethnicity, adolescents who are poor and have below-average basic skills are at greater risk of becoming pregnant than their non-poor, above-average basic skills counterparts. Additionally, those who grew up in single-mother families or whose mother was herself a teen parent are also more likely to become teen parents themselves.

TRY TO FIND:

• What are the poverty rates for Hispanics and for various subgroups? For families headed by teenagers or young adults? For female-headed Hispanic families?

• What are the educational levels for various subgroups? What percentage of Hispanics drop out of school?

• What proportion of all families and of young-adult families of various subgroups are female-headed?
Data on Teenage Pregnancy and Births. Collect specific quantitative data on teenage pregnancy and births in your community, city, or state to understand the nature of the problems. The following questions, adapted from CDF’s publications: Teenage Pregnancy: An Advocate’s Guide to the Numbers (January/March 1998) and CDF Adolescent Pregnancy Child Watch Manual Supplement (1998), can help you get started. (See the “Selected Bibliography” section in Chapter 4 for more information.)

TRY TO FIND:

- What proportion of teenagers get pregnant each year in your city, state?
- What proportion of teenagers have babies each year in your city, state?
- What proportion of unmarried teenagers have babies each year in your city, state?
- What proportion of all births are to unmarried adolescents?
- What proportion of teen births are to unmarried teenagers?
- What proportion of all out-of-wedlock births are to teenagers?

Data on the Implications of Teen Pregnancy. Gather research and/or analytical data on the implications of teen pregnancy, childbearing, and parenthood (by race, ethnicity and age, if possible). The following information has also been adapted from the two CDF publications cited above. (See the “Selected Bibliography” in Chapter 4 for more information.)

TRY TO FIND:

- What proportion of pregnant teenagers received prenatal care?
- What proportion of pregnant teenagers had low birthweight babies?
- What is the educational attainment of teen mothers?
- What proportion of teen mothers dropped out of school after giving birth?
- What proportion of teen parents are working?
- What proportion of teen families receive Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC)?
- What proportion of teen families live below the poverty level?

Step 2

Assess the needs of Hispanic youth in your community as well as available services and gaps that need to be filled.

Because of the complexities and realities of different communities, agencies — and community residents — may not always be aware of the local services that are offered to youth. As you begin to conduct a community assessment of the needs of Hispanic youth, consider the demographics of your community, what pregnancy prevention activities may be offered, what support systems exist for pregnant adolescents, and what services are offered to teenage parents and their babies. Find out whether the schools, service providers or other local programs conduct outreach specifically to Hispanic adolescents. Think holistically of the educational, health, vocational, recreational, and social development needs of the Hispanic youth you hope to serve. Talk to Hispanic adolescents in your community — and their families — to get a clear sense of their unmet needs and design your program so that you do not duplicate already-existing efforts. Your goal should be to strengthen or enhance existing services for Hispanic youth so that they will view your agency as a place that responds to their needs; therefore, you need a full understanding of existing services and service gaps.

Identify a check-off list of services that Latino youth in your community need. You can then begin to verify who in your community provides these services and easily tell where the gaps are. To help you get started, on the next page, is a list of services that Latino youth need. You can add more specific items to this list based on your community assessment and then determine what service gaps need to be filled. These general questions can be used to complement the worksheets in the Appendix of this guide. The list is partially adapted from “Youth-Serving Organizations Have Much of What Youth Need,” by Karen Pittman and Ray O’Brien, in Youth Policy, November/December 1989, Vol. 11, No. 9.

The information obtained at this step will prove invaluable as you determine what role your agency will play and as you decide what type of program will respond most effectively to your community's needs. For example, in South Phoenix, where Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. is located, agency staff and members of the Board recognized that no educational or employment training services were offered to pregnant and parenting Hispanic adolescents at the community level. As part of a national adolescent pregnancy demonstration project, Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. obtained funds and technical assistance to develop a program that would meet the education and job training needs of young Hispanic mothers. The program also offers family planning education within its educational component in order to encourage young Hispanic women to delay a repeat pregnancy.

In a similar way, Kansas City's Guadalupe Center, Inc. became aware of a growing incidence of early pregnancy among Hispanic youth. In addition to language barriers and geographic isolation, Hispanic pregnant teenagers were facing problems with the existing mainstream social and medical services. The Guadalupe Center, Inc. formed a partnership with another local organization with credibility in the Hispanic community—the Richard Cabot Clinic—to provide comprehensive services for its pregnant and parenting adolescents.

At Centro de la Comunidad Unida/United Community Center, Inc., Decisions for Youth, the teen pregnancy and substance abuse prevention program, is one of many programs that this multi-service youth development organization offers. Part of UCC's success is due to its responsiveness to the young Hispanic residents that the agency serves. Through its contact with youth and in its periodic assessment of the community, UCC staff realized that Hispanic youth in Milwaukee lacked a center where recreational activities could be enhanced by education and other supplemental supports. While UCC initially focused on recreational activities, the high teen pregnancy rate in Milwaukee and the need for sexuality education among Hispanic youth led UCC to start Decisions for Youth in 1981. At that time, local schools were not able to provide information on these controversial issues, so teachers, counselors, and school nurses were open to having UCC fill that service gap.
Areas in which Latino Adolescents Need Services

Academic Education. Opportunities and access to high quality bilingual, multicultural education, through the public schools and through alternative educational settings.

- Besides the local public schools, are any community groups providing academic educational services, either alternatively or supplementally, to Latino youth (including tutoring, English-as-a-Second Language (ESL) and college/career counseling)?
- Are alternative education or employment services available to Latino youth who drop out of school?
- Do established educational institutions in your community encourage pregnant teenagers to stay in school? Are there special programs for teen parents?

Health. Information about, and access and transportation to, a range of physical and mental health services.

- Are there community health centers, especially for low-income youth and those without health insurance?
- Are a range of health services offered to adolescents in a confidential, non-judgmental way (especially mental health, counseling, and reproductive services)?
- Are there community-based models to supplement basic school education related to substance abuse, STDs, and teen pregnancy?
- Where can pregnant, low-income teenagers go for medical and social services?

Work. Exposure to and opportunities for a variety of work experiences and career planning.

- Are there sufficient employment and volunteer opportunities for Latino youth to become involved in?
- Are there opportunities for Latino adolescents to be exposed to role models and to spend time with caring, positive adults?
- Do education and employment training opportunities exist for Latino youth who have not completed high school or who have children to support?

Recreation. Opportunities for social development and fun in a manner that promotes self-esteem and positive group interaction.

- Are there safe, supportive environments in your community for Latino young people to play sports, dance, or become involved in community activities?
- Are after-school facilities available for recreational purposes?

Family Supports. Services to strengthen families and provide support for Latino adolescents in troubled families.

- Do community-based programs exist that offer social services to Latino families or special programs that strengthen communication and connections between Latino parents and their children?
- Are there any specific services focused on sexuality education for Latino parents and children?
- Is a system in place in the community to help families in crisis and to provide caring, non-judgmental support to Latino adolescents who may need someone to listen to them and help them with decision-making?
- Are specific services offered to teen parents or young families?

NOTE: Remember to find out if these services are offered by bilingual staff and if there are any services targeted specifically to Latino youth and their families.
Step 3

Identify alternative roles for your organization to play and decide which one to adopt.

The issue of adolescent pregnancy is a complex one and can be approached from many angles. Consider carefully what your agency can do and what its focus will be. In particular, define whether you will concentrate on primary pregnancy prevention or providing parenting, educational, and vocational training skills for Hispanic teen parents. These are two very different issues that require distinct responses. It may be that both needs are going unmet in your community, but you may need to focus on building and strengthening one program rather than trying to develop and implement a program that can respond to both issues. This is where your community assessment will be useful. In addition, discussing the potential focus — and the rationale — with your Board of Directors, or a Board committee, is important.

As previously outlined, there are a range of issues to consider as your organization examines the scope of the teen pregnancy issue. As your agency defines its focus, be sure to consider the needs of young men. This is a crucial part of the problem that most teen pregnancy efforts overlook. If your organization chooses to stress parenting skills and job training for teen parents, consider how it will conduct outreach so that both young mothers and fathers will be encouraged to participate. If, on the other hand, the focus is on primary pregnancy prevention, be certain to consider how the needs of young Hispanic men will differ from those of young Hispanic women and whether your educational and other services will be delivered to single-sex or mixed groups.

In determining your program focus, you should also consider your organization’s strengths, in terms of personnel, material resources, and community credibility. For example, if your staff is already engaged in preventive programs (e.g., substance abuse), your organization may have the credibility to start addressing teen pregnancy prevention. This internal assessment will help your organization to focus on the ways in which it can make the greatest impact in helping Hispanic youth delay parenthood — or prevent a second or repeat pregnancy — and enhance their employment and educational opportunities.

At UCC, the staff is aware that there is a need for programs for pregnant and parenting teens to delay repeat pregnancies. However, the focus has been narrowed to reaching young male and female students with primary prevention and alcohol and drug abuse education, an aim that fits well with UCC’s other programs on recreation and leadership development activities. By contrast, the Via de Amistad program at CPLC was designed to respond to the immediate education, employment, and parenting needs of adolescent parents. Within the framework of the program, staff also offer sexuality and family planning education as secondary pregnancy prevention.

Step 4

Build a community coalition and a plan of action that provide strategies for potential opposition to your program.

At this point, you should have a clear sense of how urgent the problem is and of what services are being offered to Hispanic youth in your community in the area of teen pregnancy prevention. and parenting. During your community assessment process, you should also have established some contacts with the agencies providing those services. Now is the time to convene a meeting of interested community groups, individuals, and parents to determine how you can all work together. This meeting should include a discussion of the complexities of tackling the issue of teen pregnancy and of the reactions that may occur from the community. This action plan should be developed by key staff in your organization including, ideally, an administrator or Board member and refined by the groups with whom you expect to collaborate. Follow up your meeting with a letter to ensure that everyone has the same understanding of the plan of action you intend to follow.

Again, you must think clearly about what service your program intends to provide and with what groups you will most naturally connect. You must be creative in your approaches; the key is to build a comprehensive teen pregnancy prevention or parenting program that promotes positive youth development. At UCC, for example, the initial meeting with Planned Parenthood representatives raised concerns in the local community. In response, the staff devised a way in which they would provide prevention specialists from UCC and a curriculum for the schools stressing abstinence; if necessary, they would refer individual cases to Planned Parenthood.

The most important thing to keep in mind is to avoid organizational isolation; one agency alone cannot solve the teen pregnancy problem among Hispanic youth, but many agencies, concerned individuals, and parents working in collaboration and support of each other’s efforts will have an impact. This is especially true in the teen pregnancy prevention field because there is a great need for a variety of services. In addition, possible opposition from parents, the community, or churches is often magnified in the Hispanic community. Among many Hispanic families, topics related to sexuality and adolescents are taboo, but programs that stress a holistic approach, encompassing health, decision making, education, and emotions, tend to be more easily accepted by communities that might otherwise resist them. The essential factor is to anticipate ahead of time political or other opposition and to figure out ways, especially in community coalitions, to get around such obstacles to serving Hispanic youth at great risk of starting a young family.

Step 5

Develop a detailed internal plan of action for your agency.

When your organization has decided on what type of program(s) it will offer (i.e., prevention or parenting or a combination), on the specific components and services it will provide, and on what community relationships it can establish, it will have to develop an internal, detailed plan of action. This plan should be as specific as possible.

As you develop the action plan, think of natural connections to existing programs or services in your agency, such as tutoring, health services, recreation, drug and gang prevention, and social services for young mothers. This may also help as you piece together different funding sources; by designing a more comprehensive program, or one that complements existing services, you may be able to expand one program with existing funds and build a more stable base for a new component in teen pregnancy prevention.
As an example, Via de Amistad underwent a second, more elaborate planning process three years into the operation of its program. Staff relied on many different sources as they reconsidered the implementation of their comprehensive program for pregnant and parenting youth. The process included interviews with the Board of Directors, government and business leaders in Phoenix, and input from the State of Arizona’s Department of Economic Security. One result of more detailed planning is that the Via de Amistad program has been able to link Foster Grandmothers to provide babysitting services for the program participants’ children. These types of partnerships and relationships also ensure the support of the community.

AN INTERNAL PLAN OF ACTION FOR YOUR PROGRAM

The following 10 points are important to be included in your action plan.

- The group(s) that your program plans to target (e.g., sixth grade boys and girls in two neighborhood schools; pregnant women and their partners under 20; single mothers between the ages of 14 and 19; sisters of teen mothers who have never been pregnant, etc.), with eligibility requirements for each group.
- Specific goals which your program would like to accomplish, over the first year of operation and over three to five years, and how you expect to achieve them (a “strategic plan”).
- The program’s “process” objectives, that is, what your program wants to provide (e.g., 20 teen parenting classes); “outcome” objectives, the desired effects that the program will have in the relative short term (e.g., “increase Hispanic youths’ knowledge of five negative consequences of early parenthood”); and “impact” objectives, the long-term changes that the program expects to have on the target population (e.g., “reduce the Hispanic teenage pregnancy rate in our target area by 20%”). Try to state objectives in measurable terms to facilitate program evaluation and focus.
- A detailed outreach plan for your target group(s).
- The specific activities which will be offered to the youth.
- The tasks and activities which must be undertaken to achieve the objectives and the person(s) responsible for executing the different program components and for overseeing the program.
- The skills needed by staff to implement the program or outlines of job descriptions.
- A detailed budget for the project as a whole as well as for each component, and the sources or projected sources of revenue.
- A plan to document your process and to assist in evaluating your progress.
- A proposal and timeline for executing the program.

STEP 6

IDENTIFY FUNDING SOURCES AND COMMUNITY RESOURCES THAT WILL SUPPORT ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY PREVENTION AND PARENTING EFFORTS.

Once you understand the complexities of adolescent pregnancy, have a better sense of the specifics of the issue in your community, and know what role your agency would like to play, the next step will be to research the availability of funding. Identify local foundations, businesses, and state and local government programs that may provide funds or other services to support your efforts (e.g., materials, printing of brochures, job placement, mentoring programs). Do not limit yourself to local or state sources; many federal agencies or national foundations support local teen pregnancy programs. Learn their requirements and deadlines and obtain the names of key contacts.
within those organizations interested in youth development, teen pregnancy prevention, and the Hispanic community. It is important to have a sense of both needs and resources before you launch an aggressive plan of action for your agency and community.

There are other arenas that should not be overlooked as you prepare a funding strategy for your program. For instance, consider the local media as a resource to raise public and funder awareness about the problem of early childbearing among Hispanic youth. Another resource should be your Board of Directors, some of whose members may be able to provide in-kind resources or services to assist the program's development. The organizational resources in Chapter 4 may also provide information on funding sources.

The GCI Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program staff was resourceful in seeking and obtaining funding for their program. The staff did their funding research and secured a "hodgepodge" of local funding from the United Way and March of Dimes, as well as free technical assistance from a local adolescent-focused service-delivery group.

At Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc., a Board member has proven to be a crucial resource to the ongoing development, expansion, and success of the Via de Amistad program. This Board member has informally "adopted" the program. She often visits the program, speaks directly to staff, and has both supported the maintenance of the program and stressed its importance to other Board members during financially difficult times.

Step 7

Secure key staff who have an interest in and commitment to working with Hispanic adolescents.

The quality and commitment of staff may be the most important element of a teen pregnancy or parenting program. Working with young people requires many skills, some that are intrinsic and some which can be strengthened through training and collaborative opportunities for staff. The crucial factor is dedicated staff that have an interest in helping Hispanic youth develop. In Kansas City, the GCI Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program staff strongly recommended that program staff live in or be intimately connected with the neighborhood they are serving so that local youth know that staff are accessible.

In the three agencies that were visited for the purposes of preparing this guide, every Executive Director and most young people interviewed noted that the organization's staff were an essential component in the agency's credibility and success with the community. This is particularly true in the Hispanic community, where sustained, intensive outreach to families is often a very important part of working with Hispanic youth. Additionally, staff should be sensitive to the nuances within each Hispanic subgroup and to the community(ies) that the agency serves, whether they comprise recent immigrants or third-generation Hispanics. Staff can make a key difference in interactions with parents and in conducting personal outreach to youth.

Another consideration is the importance of staff input, particularly if your organization is limited in human resources. At UCC, this takes the form of versatility. Staff functions for the Decisions for Youth program are interchangeable; staff can and do perform various parts of the total program, which keeps them interested and involved. They are also free to suggest and develop new initiatives if they see a need. Similarly, at GCI Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program, staff praised the sense of flexibility promoted by the Executive Director, who only demands that the idea "be for the good of the community and based in the community." Finally, a sense of cooperation among staff is also crucial; at CPLC Via de Amistad, staff meet weekly to consult on the progress of their participants and to promote a supportive team approach to serving the youth in the community.

Step 8

Establish Cooperative Agreements with Other Community Agencies Responsible for Delivering Services to Youth.

An important factor to remember is that most successful programs for youth are comprehensive in scope. Young people respond best to programs that do not compartmentalize their needs — and Hispanic youth and parents feel more comfortable in community agencies that reach out to their families as a whole. This is one of the strengths of both Chicanos Por La Causa, Inc. and the Guadalupe Center, Inc. both of which have programs spanning and addressing the needs of community members, both young and old.

Now is the time to activate the coalition that you spent time developing. Re convene the groups that deliver services to Hispanic youth or who are interested in supporting your organization’s efforts. Establish processes for making referrals or for providing services in tandem with other groups. Your goal should be to create a supportive network, within a manageable and accessible location, that offers a range of services to young Latinos.

Try to work with the different institutions with which the youth in your community come into contact: schools — especially teachers, counselors, and principals — plus health providers, employment training organizations, and other youth-serving agencies (e.g., recreation, juvenile offenders’ programs). Concentrate especially on those organizations located near your agency to facilitate Hispanic teenagers' participation in activities offered. Be persistent in seeking those collaborations, since making contacts is time-consuming and requires work, and groups may find themselves isolated from other groups engaged in similar efforts because of daily demands. Use the information you obtained from your community assessment — and your coalition work — to structure your program so that it complements the activities of other groups. Contact key individuals at other agencies in writing to explain your program goals and scope, and then follow up your letters of invitation with phone calls or personal visits. Think carefully about the partners with whom you hope to collaborate and about how each will supplement your efforts in providing a teen pregnancy prevention or teen parenting program to Hispanic youth in your community.

The GCI Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program (WTP) has been especially creative in its collaborative approaches. WTP delivers its services through a multi-agency partnership which ensures that comprehensive services are delivered in coordinated ways, expands the reach of the program without depleting its bank account, and minimizes turf battles. WTP has an agreement with the Richard Cabot Clinic, a community-based health clinic, to provide prenatal, postpartum, and well-baby care for participants. Richard Cabot receives prenatal and delivery services for participants from St. Luke’s Hospital. In addition, parenting education is offered through the...
Missouri Parents as First Teachers program. Other partnerships include a local insurance company which provides infant car seats and other supplies, the Kansas City March of Dimes which assisted with the development of the English/Spanish prenatal education curriculum, Catholic Charities which accepts referrals for adoption counseling, Planned Parenthood for family planning services, Mattie Rhodes Clinic for mental health services, and Adolescent Resources Corporation for some school-based health services. Staff have also obtained corporate donations for the program in the form of paper products, food, and diapers.

In Milwaukee, UCC initiated a partnership with the local public schools. The educational curriculum developed by UCC is taught by prevention specialists in the schools. The key to this collaboration, according to UCC and school staff, is that the program has a prepared and recognized sexuality and drug abuse prevention curriculum, which is presented to both teachers and parents to ease potential concerns.

Step 9

Create an outreach plan to attract and retain Hispanic youth — especially young Hispanic men.

This may seem like an obvious step in the planning process but it is important to stress. Using the information that you have obtained from your community assessment and from your research on teen pregnancy among Hispanic youth, think of creative ways to attract young people to your program. Rely on community youth to take part in this stage of the planning process; not only will they have ideas, but they will also feel more invested in the program.

Your program should pay particular attention to the needs of Hispanic young males, who often get overlooked in teen pregnancy prevention and parenting activities, and who are a critical part of the teen pregnancy “problem.” Again, consider links with other services or programs, especially job development and recreational activities. At Via de Amistad, a 20-year-old father spoke of the need for male counselors so that he could have “someone to relate to.” Similarly, some of the young mothers to whom we spoke stressed that their partners would be willing to participate in parenting classes if they could also obtain job training.

In the Decisions for Youth program, a male-only, sexuality-specific component was initially attempted with little success. However, when this information was offered with job readiness training and job placement, the component was filled to capacity. Be creative in your approaches; information obtained from the Children’s Defense Fund on other teenage pregnancy programs describes, among others, a New York City-based clinic that attracts young males by videotaping them playing basketball and playing the tape during clinic hours. (See Chapter 4 of the guide for a selected number of references and materials that have been developed specifically to involve young men and young fathers in teenage pregnancy prevention and parenting activities.)
Step 10

Document your planning and implementation process thoroughly.

One of the most important things an agency can do as it creates a new program, especially in teen pregnancy prevention and youth services, is to document its efforts. Documentation serves four major functions. First, it helps you to gauge your own progress and determine, as you review a program’s development, what was particularly successful and what needs to be improved. It is also a valuable tool in the design of other programs or in the expansion of an existing program. Documentation is indispensable when replicating a program’s success. Finally, documentation is important to substantiate your organization’s work to funders.

Why Document Your Program?

- To determine what works in your program.
- To design new programs or modify existing efforts.
- To replicate the program’s success.
- To substantiate your work to funders.

Documentation efforts should include information appropriate to the program’s activities. Common types of information to be collected include the following:

- Detailed notes from planning meetings;
- Written explanations regarding major decisions, such as choosing to focus on teen parenting rather than primary prevention;
- Research you used to develop your program;
- A list of program objectives;
- Copies of timelines and schedules;
- Copies of job descriptions for program staff;
- Materials for staff training (guides, manuals, etc.);
- Copies of cooperative agreements with other agencies;
- Recordkeeping forms that were designed for the program and instructions for their use;
- Forms for enrolling new participants or for assessing client progress; and
- Any systems or procedures developed for carrying out evaluation.

One of the strengths of the three programs we visited is that each has developed standard materials for the program. For example, copies of intake forms, participant agreements, and program curriculum clearly outline the purpose, scope, and focus of each program — information which is useful to both program participants and staff. (See Chapter 2 of this guide for some specific examples of forms that each of the three organizations developed, which can be adapted to meet the needs of your agency and community.)
Step 11

Become an advocate for Hispanic youth.

Community-based organizations can play a valuable role in efforts to raise awareness about the needs of young Hispanics and to call attention to the critical impact of early pregnancy and parenthood on Hispanic youth. A sensitive and effective agency can serve and support Hispanic teens, act as a bridge between confused Hispanic youth and their concerned parents, and educate the larger community about the serious challenges that young Hispanics face during adolescence.

Internally, your organization will need to ensure that Hispanic youth have their needs met and that the program focus is kept on youth, rather than on organizational concerns. Externally, you may need to constantly remind the community, the media, funders, and local officials of the problems caused by neglecting young Hispanics. You can use the information that you’ve gathered in your community assessment on demographics and on the impact of the local teen pregnancy problem to highlight your cause and call attention to your program. You should also focus on positive publicity and on underscoring the accomplishments of your program, its staff, and, of course, the Latino youth who participate. Your involvement in this effort will respond to Hispanic youths’ needs and strengthen your community in the long run by providing support and guidance to an often-neglected population.

At GCI, staff from the diversion/crime prevention program work in conjunction with education and Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program staff to develop and secure adequate juvenile justice, education, and social services for Kansas City’s Hispanic youth. Similarly, CPLC program staff from the education and vocational training components meet regularly to monitor the progress of Via de Amistad participants. A juvenile offenders’ program is housed in the same facility to encourage those youth who are also teen parents to participate in education or vocational training programs.

Step 12

Develop an evaluation tool that will allow you to monitor and assess the program’s implementation and progress.

While evaluation efforts can frequently get pushed aside as you respond to daily demands, try to put special emphasis on this process. Evaluations are essential not only to run an effective program, but also to identify and respond to problems quickly. Additionally, an evaluation of your program will enable you to substantiate your work to funders and public officials, who may want to ignore the issue of adolescent pregnancy, and generate additional funds and/or increased publicity for your successes. The results of your evaluation will also prove valuable in designing other programs or expanding existing ones.

For purposes of evaluation, use the data you compiled from your documentation and needs assessment processes. At a minimum, your evaluation should include a review of the program’s:

- Daily Flow, to ensure that the process of providing services to youth is running smoothly;
- Recordkeeping System, which should be updated monthly or quarterly to report client levels and services provided;
- Program Materials, to ensure clarity, accuracy, and cultural- and age-appropriateness; and

- Sexuality Education and Family Planning Information Sessions, as well as other trainings or education sessions, to determine what participants have learned.

The CDF publication, Evaluating Your Adolescent Pregnancy Program: How to Get Started, is a useful tool for community-based organizations who have not been formally involved in a documentation and evaluation process before. Chapter 4 of this guide provides additional references for planning, documentation, and evaluation of teenage pregnancy programs. In particular, see Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention: A Guidebook for Communities, which has detailed sections on implementation and evaluation.

Finally, an article by Gerald Jay Stahler and Joseph P. DuCette in the May/June 1991 issue of Family Planning Perspectives entitled, “Evaluating Adolescent Pregnancy Programs: Rethinking Our Priorities,” suggests that individual programs focus their evaluations on:

- Program Description. Programs should describe as thoroughly as possible the program content, goals and objectives, and implementation; this will help to see how the actual program compares to the planned program.

- Client Characteristics. Detailed information, such as that captured on intake forms, is important to compare results among different populations and to determine if certain programs work more effectively with certain client groups.

- Service Utilization. This information captures the length and time of program content/ intervention and what actually occurs during the program as well as the quantity of services provided.

- Outcome and Long-Term Follow-Up. While it is often difficult to follow clients, this information is useful to determine if program components were effective in meeting goals and objectives. These data should include information on first or repeat pregnancies and health status of mother and child.

- Cost. Documenting costs overall and per client is important for management and funding reasons and should be done at the component level, if possible.

- Program Penetration. The information collected here should tell you whether your organization is reaching its target or intended population(s).

Using these data, a periodic analysis (e.g., quarterly, biannually) will help project staff and administrators assess the program’s effectiveness and plan for the program’s future development. Additionally, you may consider conducting a long-term assessment of the program’s impact on the community.

An evaluation can contain additional components or may include organization- or program-specific reviews. Each of the three programs discussed either conducted a self-evaluation (Decisions for Youth) or had an independent party conduct the program evaluation (the Westside Teenage Pregnancy Program, Via de Amistad) based on program data obtained from participant records and staff files. Your evaluation will help you to refine, strengthen, and expand your teen pregnancy prevention and/or parenting program to better serve the needs of Latino youth in your community.

Each worksheet is provided with the following information: a description of the worksheet’s purpose; instructions on how to use the form; and tips on how the form is completed, and relates to the other worksheets. The NCLR Worksheets are meant to be reproduced and adopted for an individual organization’s use during the development of its teenage pregnancy prevention or parenting program.
Purpose:
The purpose of this worksheet is to help you develop a demographic and socioeconomic profile of the Hispanic youth in your community. The information will help you identify the needs of Hispanic youth, and serve as their advocate in discussions with other community leaders, city and state agencies that provide services to Hispanic youth, and others interested in youth issues and programs. The data comparing the Hispanic population with the other population groups will also help you demonstrate the needs of the Hispanic population to potential funders, policy makers, and program administrators.

How to Use:
- This worksheet has three sections: Section A and Section B ask for general information on the area covered by the needs assessment, and Section C asks specific questions about the community’s Hispanic youth.
- If statistics to answer a question are not available, estimate them based on your knowledge and the data which are available. Also, if your service area is a neighborhood within a city, or an area for which specific data are not available, you may want to make an extra copy of the form. Complete one for the city, metropolitan area, or county of which you are a part, and one for the area you serve. It will probably be necessary to estimate data for your community using your knowledge of the population and the information collected for the larger geographic area. If you don’t have the information needed to make an estimate, note that on the form and try getting the missing information as you become more involved in establishing partnerships and coalitions with other youth-serving agencies.

Tips:
- Data to help you complete the worksheet may be available from a number of sources, including the following three sources (See “National Organizations” in Chapter 4 of this guide for additional information):
  1. U.S. Census Bureau Reports and other products may provide information on the demographic and socioeconomic status of the population by racial/ethnic group for a county, city, or metropolitan area;
  2. State, county, or local governments may have information about the characteristics of the population in their area; and
  3. Federal agencies, such as the National Center for Education Statistics or the National Center for Health Statistics.

2. List not more than 10 needs or problems which are of major concern to the local Hispanic community. (Review Worksheet 1 to Worksheet 4 in developing this list.)

3. Next to each item in the above list indicate how important your organization believes the need or problem to be relative to other needs by ranking it 1, 2, or 3 (1 = some importance, 2 = average importance, 3 = very important). List below the top three to five issues.
4. List your organization’s major strengths which might enable it to become an active player in the youth-serving network, especially in teenage pregnancy prevention efforts. Consider your organization’s contacts, experience, and capabilities, including experience in (a) analyzing needs; (b) developing or running programs; (c) preparing policy documents; (d) working with coalitions, advisory committees, the media, and elected and appointed public officials; (e) being an advocate/facilitator; (f) working with youth; or (g) being a service provider.

5. List your organization’s weaknesses or limitations which might make it difficult to become actively involved in youth activities or teenage pregnancy prevention/teen parenting. Consider such factors as staff and Board expertise, existing commitments, and resources.

6. List not more than 10 potential roles or activities related to Hispanic youth which are badly needed and which you believe your organization might want to carry out. They may be very specific (e.g., run a teen pregnancy program) or broader (e.g., advocate on behalf of Hispanic youth with mainstream service providers and policy makers).

7. Begin to assess the appropriateness, feasibility, and priority of each possible activity on the above list by completing the table below. In Column 1 list each role or activity identified in Question 6. In Column 2 indicate for each role/activity a high, medium or low level of (a) community need; (b) consistency with mission; (c) capacity of organization to implement; and (d) need for more resources and chances of obtaining them. In Column 3, state the advantages and disadvantages of undertaking each role/activity. Compare each role and activity with the organization’s missions, goals, objectives, and target groups identified in Question 1 and the priority needs identified in Question 3. Now, circle those roles/activities which appear to address priority issues and to be appropriate and feasible for your organization.

Purpose:
This worksheet will help you develop specific objectives for your organization's efforts to help meet the needs of Hispanic youth especially related to teen pregnancy, and a work plan for accomplishing them.

How to Use:
- Try to answer all the questions to the best of your ability, and seek the participation and comments from your organization's staff and leadership.
- Refer to other sources which describe or document your organization's development and implementation of another community-based program.
- If available, use your organization's administrative records from another program as a reference for considering goals, objectives and budget.

Tip:
- As you establish your goals and objectives and decide on specific tasks and activities, look back to Worksheet 4: An Analysis of the Needs of Hispanic Youth and Worksheet 5: Choosing Roles and Activities for Your Organization to make sure goals, objectives, and planned projects are consistent with the needs of Hispanic youth in your area, and the role(s) you have chosen for your organization.

WORKSHEET 6:
Plan of Action
Worksheet 6: Plan of Action

1. Determine in one paragraph the role your organization has decided to play in addressing the needs and issues related to Hispanic youth — and specifically, related to teen pregnancy. What will you try to accomplish and what activities and programs will you undertake? (Refer to the tasks and activities identified in Worksheet 3: Choosing Roles and Activities for Your Organization as you develop this statement.)

2. State those types of a teen parenting program by using the following employment training model as a component of a comprehensive mentoring program. The program would serve to increase the self-sufficiency of Hispanic youth parents and focus attention on recruiting teen fathers.
    The program would also offer links to health services and education.

3. List the specific goals for your efforts to help Hispanic youth in the next three to five years.

   Goal: To increase the education and employment skills and options of Latino teen parents.

2. Specify reasonable objectives for the first year. Try to include desired outcomes (e.g., to increase Latino youth's knowledge of the consequences of early, unplanned pregnancy) as well as process measures (e.g., to inform a specific number of community organizations about the needs of the Latino youth).

   Objective: To provide a one-year employment training and mentoring program to 15 Latino teen mothers and fathers.

4. Develop a work plan for each objective using the format on the next page. List in chronological order the major tasks and activities involved in meeting the objective. For each task or activity, identify (a) the deadline for completion, (b) persons responsible, and (c) resources needed to accomplish it.

   Developing a budget for each type of activity and figuring out the total amount of new and existing resources required to carry out the plan of action in a plan. Although the lines here are the budget, we will depend on the activities involved, the need to include preferred sources (staff time and consultant fees, cost of facility and equipment, travel, and overhead or administrative costs). Put the total amount by objective or activity on the box below.

5. Outline a plan for documenting and assessing whether you are meeting your objectives. The plan should specify who is responsible for the documentation and assessment, and when and how progress will be reviewed. There should also be a mechanism for revising work plans, if necessary, based on the results of the progress review.
